

In Santa Fe, Meow Wolf's 'House of Eternal Return' is mind-blowing in all the best ways

KATE RUSSELL

At the "House of Eternal Return," a multimedia, interactive art installation, visitors are invited to explore each room. Most incorporate interactive elements that pull visitors deeper into the underlying story.

By Joseph P. Kahn | GLOBE CORRESPONDENT MARCH 27, 2019

Santa Fe has long been a mecca for artists and art lovers. From the many galleries lining Canyon Road to the legacy of Georgia O'Keeffe and artisanship of the Northern Pueblo Indian tribes, New Mexico's capital city has offered world travelers a wide and colorful artistic palette from which to choose.

With the opening in 2016 of "House of Eternal Return," a multimedia, interactive art installation designed and built by the Meow Wolf artists' collective, it now has something to offer otherworldly travelers, too.

Top 10 Trending Articles

Viewed Commented Shared

State tosses out MCAS question about 'Underground Railroad' after students, teachers protest

This Harvard astronomer's theory on aliens earned him ridicule. Here's why he's standing by it

Six years after Sandy Hook, traumatic grief still grips Newtown every day

'Happy Place' comes to Boston, and it's hell

Mueller's report is said to be more damaging to Trump than Barr revealed

The Red Sox needed a lucky bounce to beat the Athletics, and they earned it

Red Sox are never too busy to keep track of Yankees, and other notes

With the new Big Three leading the way, Celtics give a glimpse of their potential

Felicity Huffman and Lori Loughlin appear in Boston court in college cheating scandal

At Northeastern, Buttigieg says millennials want better answers on the economy